With a bachelor’s degree in environmental engineering from Clemson University, she started out at the engineering department at Berkeley Country Water and Sanitation. During her six years designing, reviewing, and approving water and sewer plans, Ellie saw tremendous growth in both private and public development. She followed her passion for water resources and planning by returning to Santee Cooper (having served as a summer student during college) and joining the Integrated Resource Planning Team. Ellie applies her experience in engineering, design, and technical reviews to developing and maintaining a sophisticated, long-term power planning model; facilitating and leading support studies (including reserve margin and integration studies); and managing stakeholder engagement process, while coordinating with internal subject matter experts.
